An investigation into the biomechanics of human knee joint dislocation was performed. Longitudinal ligament forces were measured using the fibrin sealing and rupture technique and a joint capsule insertion technique. The anterior cruciate ligament (ACL) force and the anterior band force of the posterior cruciate ligament were determined. The posterior capsule forces, both in tension and compression, were tested along the articular margin of the medial side and along the articular margin of the lateral side. Dislocation of the knee joint from flexion to extension caused a differential change in the longitudinal ligament forces. The anterior capsule forces were tensile only, and then increased with increasing extension. The posterior capsule forces also showed increasing tibiotalar force with increasing extension.
